The Dakota Sioux. Little is known about that building, but there is some evidence to suggest it was built about agreement between the Mormons and the Omaha Indians for the right to remain on Indian lands for two years. Later the Oto-Missouri Indians, also living in the vicinity of Bellevue, said the land did not belong to the Omaha

Indians, who had come to the vicinity just a year before the Mormons -- that it was, in fact, Oto land. When the Omaha Indians demanded, about two months after the treaty, rent for the land the Mormons were using, the Oto quickly sent a delegation of their own demanding preferential treatment. Church leaders offered to build a strong
